POLAR BEAR

Of all the great bears that inhabit the many parts of the globe, by far the most spectacular is the Polar Bear. This great, flesh-eating animal of the Far North lives on the ice floes and in the frigid waters of the Arctic Ocean. Their white coats are the perfect camouflage for the icy wastes that is their home. These huge carnivores never come within hundreds of miles of the mainland or the haunts of men.

The favorite hunting grounds of these bears are the edges of the pack ice, where icebergs and broken pan-ice alternate with areas of open, frigid water. Here he hunts seals and fish, and isn't averse to hunting man should an Eskimo come within easy range of his mighty claws.

A full-grown Polar Bear may be as much as nine and a half feet long, and big males have been known to reach a weight of 1,600 pounds. Its white coat, tinged slightly with yellow, is heavy and warm and blends well with the snow and ice when he creeps toward his prey. The Polar Bear has a smaller head, a longer neck and a more slender body than other bears. This snaky, otter-like build helps to make him a powerful swimmer with great agility in the water. To keep from slipping on the surface of snow and melting ice, nature has equipped the white Bear with a dense pad of fur on the soles of his feet.

A very dangerous animal, the Polar Bear, even those born in captivity, can never be trusted. In their native haunts they will not hesitate to attack man if they are hungry. In winter the she-bear enters a hollow, or cave, in an iceberg, or burrows into a deep bank of snow, and gives birth to one or two cubs. These cubs will grow into tough, strong, vicious bears, in a wasteland where only the toughest, strongest and most vicious can survive.
